knows him will honestly contend that his faults are not largely temperamen-tal. He is something of an egotist. given to vainglorious conversation and leclamation, and has an extreme faculty for irritating many with whom he comes in contact. However, when you consider the intrinsic worth of the man, his splendid mind, his large grasp of public questions, his faculty for looking out for his people, his great skill as an orator and debater, and know that after the froth and fulmination he can get to the bottom of a proposition quicker and more sanely than almost any other senator, and that after a certain amount of byplay he is sound as a nut on public questions, his limelight seeking can be overlooked as temperamental, as I have aiready said, and his other fine qualities freely acknowledged. There has never been any question of Beveridge's courage, nor of his integrity. He could have made things very comfortable for himself in the senate by voting for the tariff bill, even after he had opposed it up to the last ditch. He might have secured the aid of powerful influences toward his reelection. Instead, he voted against the bill and now goes to his state for justification and indorsement. So far as being the unanimous choice of his party for senatior, and so far as being the issue in the campaign are concerned, he will have that measure of justification and industrement that comes before the su-preme event of the elections. It isn't likely there will be in the country a clearer cut chance to demonstrate the exact feeling of the insurgent Republicans against the present conduct of affairs in the Republican party than will occur in Indiana. Here is an insurgent state, with the bulk of the insurgent state, with the bulk of the party dissatisfied with Taft and openly antagonistic to Aldrich and Cannon, displeased with the tariff law, in favor of honest revision and at outs with many of the announced policies of the administration, and it will have the chance to reelect a senator who represents the sentiment of that state on all vital points.

There will be no other large issue. Candidates will be for Beveridge or against Beverldge. It will be, in a sense, a national campaign.
